Cataract in patients with AMD: Thumbs up for surgery, with realistic expectations

Age-related macular degeneration is the leading cause of vision loss in people older than 60 years in the United States, affecting approximately 11 million in the United States, with a projected increase of 13 million by 2040. Most of them in the course of the disease will also develop cataracts, with a consequent worsening of vision. In this review, a "holistic approach to vision" is proposed that takes into account both cataract and macular degeneration, and the potential for real-world potential, depending on realistic expectations. It is important for patients with macular degeneration to be given the full opportunity for cataract surgery, which may have an impact on the quality of life. Research D. R.
